Juſto ordine tradens,

Singulas confirmans.

A a, Roman. A a, Italian, both of moſt general uſe in writing the European languages: A a, Engliſh Saxon; 𝔄 a, Engliſh black letter, nearly, as all the reſt, reſembling that of the German alphabet; Α α, Greek, called alpha, from the Hebrew א aleph, which, as all the letters in the Hebrew tongue are ſignificant, denotes either an ox, or a leader, marks of excellence and priority. The firſt place is deſervedly given to this letter on the account of its ſimplicity, being little more than an opening of the mouth; and its ſound, as a vowel (for it is properly a radical conſonant, as are all the reſt) is determined by the adjunct vowel, if it hath any, if not, it is ſilent, and hath no ſound. From this uſe of the Hebrews, the later Greeks ſeem to have taken their note of an eaſy breathing, which they prefixed to all words beginning with a ſlender ſound, as in ἀπὸ, ἐπὶ, &c. to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe which begin with an aſpirate; as in ἅμα, ἑκάς. This was done after they had diveſted the eighth letter H of the conſonant power which it held in their ancient alphabet conformable to the Hebrew, to make uſe of its figure in denoting the long power of the vowel E. But the Latins followed them not herein, having formed their language from the ancient Æolians and Ionians, who had only the Cadmean alphabet of ſixteen letters. But to proceed, the Latin and Engliſh A hath the ſame power and figure as the Greek; but its name, as likewiſe the reſt of the letters, from the ſimple ſound a, bé, cé, &c. In Engliſh we have a threefold ſound of this vowel; ſhort, as in bat, cat, &c. like the Hebrew pathahh; long, as in dāte, ſāte, &c. mix'd with o, obſcure, as in call, fall, where we hear the ſame ſound as in olive, hollow, ſave that in the former it is long, conformable to the Heb. ָ kametz, but in the latter ſhort, conformable to ֳ chateph kametz. It is greatly to be wiſhed that we had more letters expreſſive of vocal ſounds; or marks on thoſe we have, to aſcertain their power in the ſame ſyllable; as in fallow, falling; or in thoſe which are analagous, as in coſt, moſt, &c. The want hereof equally affects our Latin pronunciation; for we pronounce mălus and mālus, pater and mater with the ſame ſound, which we can ſcarcely think the Latins did. We are indeed more ſecure in the Greek tongue, becauſe directed by more vowels, and the uſe of accents. But to return, A, before e, and u in the ſame ſyllable, make two diphthongs, æ, and au, whereof the former in Latin is ſubſtituted both for αι the proper, and ᾳ the improper diphthong of the Greeks, as in Ἀινέιας, Æneas, τῇ σφαίρᾳ, ſphæræ; as, on the contrary, the ancient Latins in their own words, when they had occaſion to divide their æ, changed it into the Greek αι; as in aulai, pictai, frugiferai. Some make ai a Latin diphthong, as in aio, Caius; but in ais, and ait, i manifeſtly belongs to the latter ſyllable, and the Greeks write not Γαῖος, but Γάϊος; whence it ſeems to be very manifeſt that ai in the Latin tongue is not a diphthong, as in the Greek. As there is a mutual intercourſe between all the vowels with each other, ſo in this a is changed into e; as in lacto, delecto, ago, egi; ſo e into a, as in decem, decanus, aveo, avarus; a into i, as in apiſcor, adipiſcor; ſo i into a, as reipſa, reapſe; a into o, as in ſparta, ſportum, taxus, toxicum; o into a, as in foveo, favilla, volvo, valvæ; a into u, as in camera, cumera, taberna, contubernium; u into a, as in glubo, glaber, μυδάω, madeo. In the Roman comitia, or aſſemblies for making laws, the people had two tables: in the one were two letters, U. R. uti rogas, ſignifying their aſſent; becauſe a motion for a new law to be made was called rogatio: in the other this letter A. i. e. antiquo, or antiqua probo, to ſhew their diſſent. In capital cauſes they had alſo two tables covered with wax, in one whereof was this letter A. i. e. abſolvo; in the other C. for condemno; whence the former is by Tully, pro Milone, called ſalutaris, the latter triſtis. In numerals it denoted anciently 500, and Ā 5000. Other uſes of this, and the reſt of the letters, in the compendious notes of the ancients, are too many here to be enumerated; I have therefore under this, as well as the following letters, explained thoſe which moſt frequently occur, referring the explanation of the reſt to a more general Collection thereof out of Sertorius Urſatus, and others, which may be of uſe, ſometimes, even to the learned themſelves, in reading ancient inſcriptions found upon Roman monuments and coins. A a, Lat. ab A, α Græc. Nam formas literarum veteres Græcas pene eaſdem fuiſſe, quæ ſuo tempore fuerunt Latinæ, teſtatur Plinius 7, 58. Hanc vocalem ut inſuaviſſimam notat Cicero in Orat. 49, quod tamen de crebra ejus repetitione accipiendum; nam in ea ſæpius iterata aſperitatem notavit etiam Martianus Capella. Sæpe quidem in alias atque alias vocales mutatur, tam longas, quam correptas, aliquando forte ſuavioris ſoni cauſâ; ſed cum hoc commune habeat cum reliquis vocalibus, imo & conſonis, nihil hinc à primæ literæ dignitate abſcedere videtur.

B. b. The ſecond letter, but firſt conſonant in the alphabet. It is a labial, ſhutting the lips, which A had opened. Among the Mutes it hath a middle Place, and Power, between the ſmooth and eaſy Sound of P, and the aſpirate and rougher Sound of Ph, F, and V, every one of which in the Derivation and Inflection of Words, is frequently, for the better Sound, changed into ſome of the other; ſo from βόσκω comes paſco, from ἀπὸ ab, from labor, lapſus; from ſcribo, ſcripſi; b always continuing in the Inflection of ſuch Words before a Vowel; but, becauſe it would otherwiſe be too hard, before a conſonant it is ſoftened into p. So from rubeo, rufus; from θρίαμβος, triumphus; from φάλαινα, balæna; from βρέμω, fremo; from γίλβος, gilvus; from אב, avus: Yea, in ſome Latin Words, b and v are indifferently writ; as ſebum and ſevum; ſo alſo b and p; as Publicola and Poplicola; b and f, as, bubalus and bufalus. B is ſometimes inſerted in the Middle of Words for the better Sound, as in ambages, ambio, amburo, &c. B is ſervile in the Inflection of the Dative and Ablative Plural of the Third, Fourth, and Fifth Declenſions of Latin Nouns; as likewiſe of the Preterimperfect Tenſe, and alſo the Future, in the Firſt and Second Conjugations.

C, c. The third letter, but ſecond conſonant, may indeed be copied immediately from the Hebrew כ, being exactly the ſame, only in complaiſance to our way of writing, turning towards the right; yet is much more probably framed from the Greek Γ, its right and perpendicular line, for the more eaſe and quick diſpatch in writing, inſtead of an angle, degenerating into a ſemicircle. For it is evident, that the Latin letters are many of them exactly the ſame with the Greek; and moſt of the reſt, which are common to both tongues, differ no more, than haſte, conveniency of writing, or, perhaps, ſome novel, and growing depravation might probably occaſion. And I may add alſo, That many words natives of Greece, were made denizens of Rome, without any formality of changing their garb, eſpecially thoſe of Doric families: others again, in pretty near proportion between their number of words and letters, ſuffer ſome change, to be more civilly treated there: beſides, it is notorious that the Roman youth were anciently taught both to read, and write their own language by Greek maſters. This I judge proper to obſerve here once for all, and proceed. The rank which C holds in the Latin alphabet, anſwering that of Γ in the Greek, is a farther evidence of this extraction: beſides, when the Greeks in their own letters expreſs a pure Latin word, where this letter is found, they commonly ſubſtitute Γ, or K, for Cajus Cæſar, writing Γαῖος Καῖσαρ. Yea, in many Latin words c and g are indifferently writ; as Cajus Cnæus, or Gajus Gnæus. But before I go farther, I muſt do a piece of juſtice to this letter, by declaring, that though it acknowledge the Greek Γ its parent, yet it may challenge the ſame regard from the Latin letters g and k, and, in the opinion of ſome learned men, from q alſo: the firſt whereof was not known to the Romans, till after the firſt Punic war. This is plainly proved from the royal laws, where Acnom is writ for Agnum, Acrom for Agrum; and that famous remaining piece of Antiquity, the monumental pillar of Duilius, where we read Lecio pucnandod, exfociont, &c. for Legio pugnando, effugiunt. As for K, it appears never to have been much uſed, and is now ſo obſolete, that it is not writ in more than two or three Latin words, where c is always indifferently, or perhaps better, uſed. And for Q, the indifferency found in writing very many Latin words therewith, or with C, as cur, or quur; quum, or cum; locutus, or loquutus, cottidie, or quotidie, hath induced many Critics to deduce its original from c. But this ſhall be conſidered in its proper place. The name of C, if we attend to analogy, is always Kè, as is its ſound before all vowels; never Sè. And here, with much reluctance, I remark, That foreigners, who own we underſtand Latin perfectly, and write it correctly, account us little better than barbarians, in ſeveral parts of pronunciation; but in none more juſtly, than our depraved ſound of this letter before æ, œ, e, i, and y, as if it were S; which at the ſame time our learned men confeſs to differ from the ancient uſage of Greece, and Rome, to be unreaſonable in itſelf, and to introduce a ſtrange confuſion in words and things; ſo that cædo, and ſedo; cæpi, and ſepi; cenſus, and ſenſus; cicer, and ſiſer; cygni, and ſigni, and many thouſands more, have with us, one and the ſame ſound. Hence alſo it comes to paſs, that its ſound is intirely loſt after ſ; ſo that cæna, and ſcena; celeris, and ſceleris, and innumerable words of the ſame kind, are confounded. This I humbly leave to the conſideration and redreſs of the learned ſchool-maſters of this kingdom, as very well deſerving it, and return to its true ſound; which is the ſame with that uſurped by the exploded K, and ſtands related to the harder ſound of g, as p to b; and therefore in the inflection of words g before a vowel, is changed into c before a conſonant; as ago, actum, not agtum; lego, lectum, not legtum; juſt as ſcribo, ſcriptum. Neither ought it to be ſounded with an aſpirate, as the modern Italians do, who ſay chichindela, Chichero, &c. for cicindela, Cicero. Concerning its intercourſe with ſ, and t, the tenuis of the third Claſs of Mutes, I rather chooſe to treat in the diſſertation upon thoſe letters, leſt I be too tedious in this.

[à κώμη, vicus, & ᾠδὴ, cantus, quod initio vicis juvenes cantare ſoliti eſſent, antequam in urbes conveniſſent, Feſt.] A comedy, or interlude. See the commendation, uſe, and end of it in Donatus's preface to Terence; its definition in Scal. Poet. 1, 5. It is either old, or new. The old, whereof were maſters Eupolis, Cratinus, and Ariſtophanes, is deſcribed by Quint. 10, 1. and the exceſs of liberty, its greateſt fault, by Cic. 4. De Repub. The new differed from the old almoſt in every thing. In matter, manner, time, furniture, ſtyle, and verſe. Their matter was almoſt as copious as that of Satyre; every action and perſon, even the greateſt commanders and princes not being excepted, and herein more blame-worthy, becauſe it reflected on the good as well as bad. See Cicero in the place quoted. The new fetched its arguments from common life, as alſo its perſons, who were generally young gentlemen in love, and their ſervants tricking their old maſters to gratify their young ones. The old flouriſhed about the time of the Peloponneſian war; the new when Greece had loſt its liberty. The furniture of the old very large, of the new, very ſmall; the Chorus being entirely taken away. The ſtyle of the old was epic or ſatyrical, of the new, mean or low. The old admitted all kinds of verſe, the new only iambic. The neceſſary parts of both are four, Protaſis, Epitaſis, Cataſtaſis, Cataſtrophe; which ſee in their places.

D, The fourth Roman letter, is almoſt of the ſame figure with that in the famous Βȣϛροφηδὸν inſcription, brought into Britain by William Sherrard Doctor of laws, and famous in many parts of curious learning; who, being Conſul at Smyrna, ordered it with the utmoſt care and diligence to be copied from an huge ſtone lying ſtill at Sigeum, where the literature uſed 2300 years ago, which was before the uſe of the long vowels, and double conſonants had obtained, ſhews itſelf not only to the wonder and admiration of the curious, but alſo to the great benefit and advantage of ſtudents, and critics in the Greek tongue; eſpecially as illuſtrated by the reverend and learned Divine and Antiquary Mr. Chiſhull. In this monument the angles which are unequal, thus △, come nearer the form of the Roman than the modern Δ, whoſe angles are equal, and therefore more eaſily ſlipping into the form of the Italian D, by leaving the left angle as it was, and circumflecting the two others for the greater haſte in writing; which was done ſoon after, as we plainly ſee in the noble inſcription of Herodes Atticus, that learned Critic and Antiquary, graven on his pillars exactly both in letters and ſpelling after the pattern of remote ages: vid. Gruter. Inſcript. p. 27. Nor is it a wonder that the Latin letters are the ſame with the Greek, ſince Latium itſelf was called antiently Græcia major. Thus much I thought fit to premiſe with reſpect to the form of the letter. As to its name, this, as all the other letters, the Romans ſeem to have called by the Greek names, Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, &c. So Juvenal, Hoc diſcunt omnes, ante Alpha & Beta, puellæ, Sat. 14, 209.

So Cicero calls his country ſeat at Formiæ, Digamma, becauſe it begins with the Æolian F.

As for the power of this letter, it hath a middle ſound between t and th; and therefore hath its place in the middle of the laſt Rank of the Mutes, and is a t hardned, as t is a d ſoftned; which, as thoſe of the other ranks, are frequently changed into each other, as from μῦδος, mutus; from ἀκίδος, the gen. of ἀκὶς, ſagitta; from ἄθηρ, ador; πέρθω, perdo; γαθέω, gaudeo. Neither doth our Engliſh tongue refuſe this change, as at from ad, what from quid, two from duo, ſo three, thruſt, from tres, trudo; water from ὕδωρ. It alſo admits a ſubſtitute out of the ſecond rank of its ſiſters, to ſoften its ſound, as quicquid, quicquam, quicque, for quidquid, &c. Neither doth this letter refuſe an intercourſe with three liquids, l, n, r. To omit Greek words, wherein their mutual offices are moſt obvious, as leſs inſtructive to the younger ſort, for whoſe ſervice theſe notes upon literature, in the proper ſenſe of the word, are principally deſigned; the antients ſaid dingua, ſedda, for lingua, ſella; cadamitas for calamitas; diſpennere for diſpendere; arventus for adventus; and this letter ſtill keeps its poſt in arbiter and arceſſo. It alſo correſponds with the ſolitary ſ, as Ῥόδον, roſa. It admits before it in the ſame or diverſe ſyllables, of the mutes, b; as, βδέω, pedo, bdellium, abdico; and g, but not in the ſame ſyllable, as, ὀγδόος, ſmaragdus: of the liquids, l, n, r, in diverſe ſyllables; as, calda, candor, cardo: and in the Latin tertius, and Engliſh Third, you have all the three of the laſt rank exemplified. In the prepoſition ad, almoſt before any conſonant, d may keep its place, or be changed into the conſonant of the beginning word, except b, v, and j; as, adcurro, or accurro, &c. but the change is more uſual in many words, to make the pronunciation ſofter, or quicker; for we ſeldom write adcommodo, adcuſo, &c. indeed herein uſe is the beſt rule. This letter alſo was antiently uſed to prevent the colliſion of two vowels in different words, as, Cenſes med eſſe? for me eſſe, Plaut. which uſe it ſtill retains in the ſame word; as, prodes, proderam, prodire, for proes, proeram, proire. Yea in the moſt antient times, it was added to the preceding word even before conſonants, as it ſhould ſeem to make the ſound more maſculine, as in the Duilian or Bilian pillar, In altod marid pucnandod, for In alto mari pugnando. Laſtly, in numerals D ſtands for 500; being not a letter, but rather uſed for a numeral mark, as the Greeks uſe ϛ for 6, and ϟ for 90: for the numeral note of 1000, being CIↃ, from the old ↀ, the half thereof is IↃ; which, for quicker writing drawn cloſe together, makes D.
